Cornell Bowers CIS
Information Science

Job Analysis Activity

A T-chart can be a simple but helpful tool to ensure that you are including the most relevant examples of your experience when you apply for a given position. Go through the job description and find the major requirements and responsibilities and list them on the left-hand side. On the right-hand side, write down experiences you've had that show evidence that you have what the job requires.

Things the position requires:	My corresponding experience:

The STAR or CAR Method

When you respond to a behavioral interview question, your answer should include a specific example based on how you have performed in the past, not a hypothetical suggestion of how you would perform in the future. This can be accomplished by breaking down each example using a context, action, results (CAR) format.

- Context – outline goals and responsibilities; briefly describe project and client, if possible

- Actions – leadership, technical skills, communication, etc.

- Results – accuracy, speed, awards